https://doi.org/10.37420/j.cer.2026.112

A Critical Examination of the Value and an Exploration of the Predicaments of Youth Literature in the New Century

He Yurong *
Tianfu College of Southwest University of Finance and Economics, Mianyang City, Sichuan Province, China
Corresponding author, E-mail: 897593475@qq.com

Abstract
Youth literature is a type of literature that virtually every adolescent has encountered to some degree during their formative years. It encompasses a wide variety of genres, including fantasy, chic-lit, and romance. As a phenomenon within the literary world, discussions surrounding it remain ongoing and diverse in opinion. Unlike academic works that emphasize theoretical speculation, youth writing focuses on the confusion and bewilderment, the impulsiveness and rebellion experienced during the journey of growing up, while also being imbued with a profound nostalgia for youthful days and bygone times. This writing, closely tracing the trajectory of growth, readily projects the youthful imprints of the creators themselves and even of an entire generation. What is particularly valuable is that it closely resonates with the mindset of the adolescent demographic, thereby constructing a literary perception and narrative vision uniquely belonging to this generation. This paper aims to provide a concise overview from three aspects: the background against which youth literature emerged, its primary content, its merits, and its limitations.

Keywords
New Century; Youth Literature; Limitations

I. Introduction

Before elaborating on this subject, it is necessary to first clarify its definition. Youth literature typically takes youth as its central theme, yet its content is not strictly confined to this; it frequently encompasses friendships, romantic love, and familial bonds during adolescence, and can also extend from a youthful perspective to deeper reflections on people, events, and the temporal-spatial dimensions of existence. Scholarly consensus on this definition has yet to be reached. Some viewpoints hold that youth literature is a continually expanding category, having evolved from the developmental threads of children's literature and juvenile literature while also broadly assimilating creative elements from other literary genres, ultimately forging its own distinct stylistic characteristics. Other writers uphold a stance of "literature knows no age," proposing that "there is only literature in the world, and no such thing as youth literature," emphasizing that the core criterion for literary judgment should be its literariness itself, rather than the age of the creator or the subject matter.

© 2026 by the author(s); licensee Mason Publish Group, this work for open access publication is under the Creative Commons Attribution International License (CC BY 4.0). (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/)

For the purposes of this paper, youth literature is defined to encompass both works that directly take adolescence—this particular life stage—as their subject of writing, and those that, while not focusing on youthful themes, nonetheless possess aesthetic orientations and imaginative dimensions that align with the reading needs of adolescents.

II. The Background of the Emergence of Youth Literature in the New Century

The rise of youth literature in the new century was not accidental; rather, it resulted from the interplay of multiple factors, including epochal transformations, social transition, cultural environment, and group-specific traits. It is rooted in a particular historical soil while also echoing the spiritual aspirations of a generation of youth.

(A) Economic Development and the Awakening of Generational Consciousness

Since the advent of the new century, alongside the continuous deepening of the market economy and the rapid rise of consumer culture, concepts such as youth, fashion, and individuality have become cultural symbols eagerly pursued by the market. Concurrently, the relative affluence of material life has afforded the post-80s generation of youth more energy to focus on the joys and sorrows of their inner worlds. All these factors provided a certain social soil for the creation of youth literature. They began to focus on themselves and express themselves. Whether it be the bittersweet experiences of campus life, the confusion of growing up, or the palpitations of emotion, these nuanced personal experiences became the core creative material for young authors. During this period of social transition, they no longer concentrated on grand national narratives but turned instead to the writing of private experience. The "post-80s" generation constitutes China's first clearly labeled "generational cohort" and simultaneously the first large-scale generation of only children. Growing up without the companionship of siblings, they share a collective memory of a solitary coming-of-age experience. The experience of studying away from home brought about by urbanization, along with the sensitivity and fragility of interpersonal relationships—this unique trajectory of growth fostered a strong sense of generational identity, a desire to express their own youthful memories and values through a exclusive literary form. These factors served as the creative impetus for post-80s youth literature.

(B) Media Transformation and Innovation in Publishing Mechanisms

At the beginning of the 21st century, with the development of the internet and the rapid popularization of forums, blogs, and literary websites, a large number of young writers began publishing essays, novels, and campus stories online. The publication of literary works no longer required the multiple layers of screening by publishers and magazines, but could be achieved swiftly through online platforms. Early platforms such as "Rongshuxia" and "Hongxiu Tianxiang" served as starting points for many young writers. The New Concept Essay Competition, sponsored by Mengya (The Sprout), broke away from the paradigm of exam-oriented composition, encouraged individual expression, and discovered the first batch of representative youth literature authors, including Han Han, Guo Jingming, and Zhang Yueran. It was a landmark catalyst for the large-scale emergence of new-century youth literature. With their internet-infused language, straightforward emotional expression, and stories closely connected to youthful life, they quickly resonated with the adolescent demographic. This model freed youth literature from the weighty narratives of traditional literature, presenting a lighter, more vibrant character. With the market-oriented reform of the publishing industry, publishers keenly recognized the immense potential of the "post-80s" readership and proactively adjusted their publishing strategies. On the one hand, they tapped into the vast reading consumer base of middle school students, actively planning themed series and periodicals for youth, deliberately crafting fixed genre models such as "youth angst," "campus romance," and "rebellious growth" to precisely capture the adolescent readership. On the other hand, they adopted commercial packaging models, creating star personas for authors, designing exquisite book layouts, and organizing offline events such as book signings, which greatly propelled the dissemination and popularity of post-80s youth literature. To a certain extent, youth literature in this context functioned more as a cultural commodity for consumption, attracting a large and loyal base of adolescent readers.

© 2026 by the author(s); licensee Mason Publish Group, this work for open access publication is under the Creative Commons Attribution International License (CC BY 4.0). (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/)

III. Core Thematic Expressions of New-Century Youth Literature

(A) The Writing of Rebellion in Growing Up

Adolescence is a crucial period of personal development, a time when one sheds childhood ignorance—when everything seems to become clear yet remains simultaneously ambiguous. It is also the most fantasy-filled period, when one begins to form one's own thoughts about the world, thus giving rise to rebellion against the adult world. A representative author in this regard is Han Han. Han Han's works consistently revolve around themes of youthful bewilderment, dreams, and resistance, closely matching the growth mindset of young people. His series of works repeatedly engage with this narrative: the struggle of being trapped and the urge to escape. The "post-80s" generation, growing up during a period of rapid economic development, pursued individualistic consumerist trends and were exposed to ubiquitous Western popular culture. They no longer believed in the grand narratives of suffering, seeking instead to deconstruct and subvert the sublime, to discover the other side of the classics, and often felt alienated from the real world. They sought some form of alternative reality in narratives that transcended everyday experience and imagination. In Triple Gate, the protagonist Lin Yuxiang appears to be trapped by family, school, and society. Through the protagonist's academic difficulties and growth hardships, Han Han sharply critiques the rigidities of the exam-oriented education system, pioneering the rebellious banner of youth literature and precisely striking a chord with the sentiments of a generation of adolescents. Following the craze ignited by Triple Gate, works such as Chun Shu's Beijing Doll, Xu Jia's I Love Sunshine, and Guo Jingming's On the Edge of Love and Pain emerged successively, collectively heralding the official rise of new-century youth literature. Written by adolescents themselves and rooted in authentic growth experiences, these works not only depict defiant individuality, the pain of transformation, and the melancholy of youthful romance but also vigorously vent the resentment and dissatisfaction with the discipline imposed by the adult world. Their writing style is wild, rebellious, and vividly expressive, brimming with an unpolished, genuine energy that sketches a unique portrait of a generation's youth.

(B) Diverse Interpretations of Emotional Bonds

Love, family affection, and friendship are eternal human themes, and each generation has its own way of writing about them. Consequently, romantic and tender love stories, tear-jerking family bonds, and loyal friendships are all indispensable core motifs in youth novels. They precisely fill the emotional gaps in adolescents' growth, comforting restless hearts and providing a gentle refuge in words for unplaceable yearnings and confusions. Each life stage comprehends these themes differently, leading to varied expressions. However, youthful writing represents the initial encounter with both the beauty and cruelty of these emotions, rendering it particularly naive and precious. A representative author in this vein is Guo Jingming. His works center on the emotional entanglements and growing pains of adolescence, focusing on shattered friendships, regretted love, and shattered ideals, excelling in depicting characters' struggles between reality and desire. How Many Flowers Fall in Silence tells a tragic story in a seemingly light tone, about college student Lin Lan's pursuit of love, career, and friendship during her internship before graduation, only to face unfulfilled desires and a series of unexpected setbacks. Rush to the Dead Summer portrays the pure, innocent, yet steadfast love between Xia Zhi and Fu Xiaosi, and the touching friendship between Fu Xiaosi and Lu Zhi'ang, yet ultimately, they all drift apart. Cry Me a Sad River features two girls, Yi Yao and Gu Senxiang—one from a tragic family, the other from a happy one—yet both end their young lives by jumping from a building. His more recent Tiny Times trilogy revolves around four girls—Nan Xiang, Gu Li, Lin Xiao, and Tang Wanru—and the series of changes they undergo from college to the working world, including separation, betrayal, and pain, but ultimately resolving everything through reconciliation. This shift from the decisive and singular handling of character relationships in earlier works to a more rounded and diffusive approach in later ones arguably represents a form of progress.

© 2026 by the author(s); licensee Mason Publish Group, this work for open access publication is under the Creative Commons Attribution International License (CC BY 4.0). (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/)

(C) The Expression of and Return to Ideals and Warmth

Growing up inevitably entails bewilderment; we must all experience loss and gain to understand certain truths. Yet even understanding many principles does not guarantee a smooth life. In youth, there are always so many frustrations and disappointments, often inexpressible. Therefore, we need to explore, to experience, and to express, only then can we become more resolute in being true to ourselves and honest with others. An author who has made commendable explorations in this area is Di'an. With a delicate touch, Di'an slowly narrates one heartwarming story after another. Prudent without being ostentatious, restrained and subtle, and always holding a reverent attitude towards all things in the world, she stands out distinctly among the "post-80s" writers. The expression of ideals and warmth is primarily reflected in her "Longcheng Trilogy." Set in the fictional northern city of Longcheng, the trilogy revolves around the Zheng family saga. The three installments are narrated from the perspectives of Zheng Xijue, Zheng Dongni, and Zheng Nanyin respectively, weaving together the familial bonds, mysteries of parentage, and growing pains of the family. Yet, throughout these three works, there is consistently a redeemer figure: Xijue, the protagonist of the first book. This character embodies Di'an's entire conception of warmth and idealism. He acts as the family's guardian. Orphaned at ten and raised by his uncle and aunt, the warmth of this family makes him treasure kinship deeply. He willingly serves as the family's "home base," actively taking on the responsibility of caring for family members, showering Dongni and Nanyin with care, mediating Dongni's family conflicts upon her return from abroad, and Nanyin's adolescent emotional turmoil. Even after discovering he is an unrelated foundling, he still chooses to forgo personal ambitions, silently devoting himself to the Zheng family, repaying his uncle and aunt's nurturing kindness with his actions, and becoming a crucial link in maintaining family harmony.

© 2026 by the author(s); licensee Mason Publish Group, this work for open access publication is under the Creative Commons Attribution International License (CC BY 4.0). (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/)

IV. The Value and Limitations of New-Century Youth Literature

(A) The Value of New-Century Youth Literature

1. Unique Generational Narrative Value

It portrays the growth trajectory of the "post-80s" generation from the perspective of firsthand participants, actively engaging in self-voicing and self-recording. It authentically presents the spiritual state of this generation during a period of social transition, encompassing rebellion against the educational system, confusion in emotional relationships, and the pursuit of ideals and warmth, thereby forming a unique generational narrative value. Works such as Han Han's Triple Gate and Di'an's "Longcheng Trilogy" create representative figures of the era, like Lin Yuxiang and Xijue, meticulously depicting their complete developmental paths. These portrayals are no longer scrutinized or judged from a parental perspective but instead look inward from the adolescent's viewpoint, addressing their inner turmoil and struggles, as well as the confusion and helplessness inherent in growing up. At the same time, they break away from the didactic narrative framework of traditional coming-of-age stories, prioritizing self-expression during adolescence, no longer dismissing it as a trivial or self-indulgent lament without substance. Through these rebellious, free-spirited, melancholy, or sunny youthful images, post-80s youth literature abandons empty moralizing. By vividly presenting and depicting their inner worlds and emotional aspirations through a series of dramatic plots, it uses their stories to reflect the common circumstances faced by young people. Admittedly, these works are not without exaggeration and hyperbole, yet it is undeniable that it is precisely through such writing that the youthful individuals of a specific era are rendered clearly visible.

2. Emotional Resonance and Cultural Dissemination Value

Youth literature articulates the common emotions of adolescence, including the pain of growing up, the palpitations of emotion, and intergenerational conflicts. The narration of these themes directly addresses the authentic emotional needs of adolescents. It is also within such writing that adolescents have formed their own unique culture. Unlike the straightforwardness and directness of the adult world, here, cherished friendships, unspoken love, budding crushes, and self-discovery and exploration are all concealed within the dense fabric of words—they are the secret thoughts of youth, the minor joys and sorrows, and a spiritual growth archive under the weight of pressure. Some campus youth narratives, while somewhat immature in many aspects and still open to discussion from the perspective of pure literary aesthetics and creative dimensions, have successfully created a host of vivid adolescent images. These lively figures, whether unruly and rebellious or distinctly individual, are authentic and flesh-and-blood; their joys and sorrows reflect a generation of contemporary youth who share similar life trajectories and spiritual experiences. From the perspective of literary creation, these characters encapsulate the spiritual state of a youthful demographic under a particular era, possessing a strong epochal representativeness.

(B) The Limitations of New-Century Youth Literature

While the rise of youth literature has made notable contributions to contemporary Chinese genre fiction, it has undeniably also produced certain relatively negative impacts, primarily in the following two aspects:

© 2026 by the author(s); licensee Mason Publish Group, this work for open access publication is under the Creative Commons Attribution International License (CC BY 4.0). (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/)

1. Shallow Ideological Content and Lack of Educational Function

Most creators of new-era youth literature belong to the "post-80s" generation. Compared to their predecessors, this group generally enjoyed greater material affluence. In such circumstances, they naturally lacked a profound cognition and experience of harsh external living conditions and had a less developed understanding of life's hardships, often dwelling more on the emptiness and boredom of the spiritual realm. Coupled with the fast-paced modern life that limited time for in-depth social observation, their works frequently stay on the surface of personal life, struggling to explore deeper thoughts and content. However, it is precisely this quality that lends their reflections a certain preciousness, although to some extent, they lack substantial depth and are naturally unable to fulfill the educational mission of guiding adolescents towards correct values.

2. Pervasive Commercialism and Imbalanced Value Orientation

The entire industry chain of new-era youth literature is heavily influenced by commercial capital. The restlessness and superficiality of commercialization permeate every stage of creation, publication, and dissemination, with profit as the primary driver. To maximize profits, some publishers adopt "bestseller" status as the core publishing criterion, regardless of literary, ideological, or aesthetic value, resulting in a mixed market for youth literature. Many works adopt a gloomy tone, excessively indulging in the nuanced depiction of personal emotions, confined within a narrow personal sphere from which they cannot escape. This sentiment of self-pity is easily transmitted to readers through the works, fostering a relatively negative impact, leading some to one-sidedly believe that personal emotions are the sole worthy subject of attention. This creative tendency overlooks a striving, progressive, and enterprising spirit, narrowing the horizons of young people and weakening their sense of social responsibility.

V. Conclusion

Since the beginning of the new century, the developmental trajectory of youth literature has been clearly discernible, and it has achieved certain successes. Some scholars have pointed out that youth literature and pure literature have formed a pattern of contending forces. While this undoubtedly represents significant recognition for youth literature, it is equally important to acknowledge its shortcomings. Regarding this cultural phenomenon of youth literature, we should adopt an objective and rational critical perspective. On the one hand, youth literature possesses its own considerable literary value and social significance. The "post-80s" writers, using their own growth experiences as reference, authentically depict a generation's youthful experiences, transforming individual emotions into public literary narratives that sketch the living conditions and spiritual landscapes of a broader demographic. On the other hand, the rise of youth literature also signals, to a certain extent, new possibilities for literary development. The connotation of literature is inherently broad and diverse; its core value lies in offering readers insight and thought. The emotional resonance and collisions of ideas provoked by youth literature precisely attest to the inherent value intrinsic to literary works.

Author Contributions

Writing – review and editing: He Yurong

© 2026 by the author(s); licensee Mason Publish Group, this work for open access publication is under the Creative Commons Attribution International License (CC BY 4.0). (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/)

Funding

This research received no specific grant from any funding agency in the public, commercial or not-for-profit sectors.

Acknowledgments

The author would like to acknowledge All the people who have helped me during the process of writing the article

References

[1]Yang Qingxiang. Post-80s, What to Do? [M]. Beijing: Beijing October Literature and Arts Publishing House, 2011.

[2]Jin Li. Born in History: The Configuration of Youth in Contemporary Chinese Novels since the 1980s [M]. Shanghai: Fudan University Press, 2013.

[3]Jiang Bing. "Post-80s" Literature in the New Media Era [M]. Beijing: People's Publishing House, 2014.

[4]Zhu Donglin, Zhu Xiaojin, Wu Yiqin. History of Modern Chinese Literature 1917–2012 (Volume II) [M]. Beijing: Peking University Press, 2014.

[5]Tao Dongfeng. A Course in Popular Culture [M]. Guilin: Guangxi Normal University Press, 2018.

[6]Jiang Bing. "The Literary Historical Significance of Post-80s Literature" [J]. Literary and Artistic Contention, 2009 (12):10-16. DOI:10.16537/j.cnki.wenzh.2009.12.002

[7]Sun Guirong. "Literary Experimentation Beyond Adolescence: On New-Century 'Youth Literature'" [J]. Literary and Artistic Contention, 2009 (04):45-51. DOI:10.16537/j.cnki.wenzh.2009.04.008

[8]Huang Ping. "The 'Great Era' and the 'Tiny Times': Han Han, Guo Jingming, and 'Post-80s' Writing" [J]. Southern Literary Forum, 2011 (03):5-10. DOI:10.16537/j.cnki.nfwt.2011.03.002

[9]Wang Shu, Shen Lijia. "Generational Characteristics and Spiritual Trajectories in the Portrayal of Youthful Images in the New Century" [J]. Academic Monthly, 2021, 53 (11):177-185. DOI:10.3969/j.issn.0438-0460.2021.11.017

[10]Zhang Lijun. "From Awakening, Buddha-like, Lying Flat to Re-awakening: The Realistic Evolution and Future Paths of the Youth Question in a Century of China" [J]. Journal of Guangzhou University (Social Science Edition), 2022, 21 (04):54-63. DOI:10.3969/j.issn.1673-8039.2022.04.007

[11]Shao Yanjun. "From 'Maidenly Sorrow' to 'Bizarre, Cold, and Eerie': On the 'Guidance' of the Literary World towards the 'Post-80s' as Seen through Zhang Yueran's 'Development'" [J]. Southern Literary Forum, 2005 (03):38-44. DOI:10.16537/j.cnki.nfwt.2005.03.009

[12]Liu Wei. "The Sorrows of Love in New-Century Youth Literature" [J]. Novel Review, 2010 (03):132-137. DOI:10.16537/j.cnki.xspl.2010.03.023

[13]Bai Ye, Zhang Ping. "After the Rise: Q&A on the 'Post-80s'" [J]. Southern Literary Forum, 2004 (06):16-18. DOI:10.16537/j.cnki.nfwt.2004.06.00

© 2026 by the author(s); licensee Mason Publish Group, this work for open access publication is under the Creative Commons Attribution International License (CC BY 4.0). (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0/)